

How often have you heard yourself or a colleague echo one of these four great myths of job security?...

- "I won't get fired if I do a good job."
- "If I did get fired, I could find another job tomorrow."
- "My employer will take care of me if I'm fired."
- "If they fired me, I would sue them for everything."

CareerGuard would like to explode these myths for you right now. Here are the facts:

- Doing a good job? A recent management survey found that roughly 85% of terminations had nothing to do with the competency of the executive. Another reported that circumstances beyond the control of the individual - takeovers, bankruptcies, etc. - were the major reasons for dismissals.
- Easily find another job? Job leads look a lot different when you're alone on the street, rather than an important part of an established organization. Usually, the better the job, the longer it takes to find a new one.
- Employer will take care of me? He may not be in a position to do so, particularly during tough economic times. Besides, should you really rely on the generosity of the very organization that rejects you?
- I'd sue? Don't count on a quick settlement. Court cases can drag on for years and can be quite costly. What do you live on in the meantime? What if you lose?
